What was Good?

- (James) People are wanting to contribute at the end
- (Jacob) That we all came together at the end to get the assignment done and turned in. We now understand what implementation looks like, good and bad.
- (Naeun) Teamwork near the end of the sprint was very good
- (Isabel) The way the team came together the last three days of the sprint to work continuously until everything was finished and turned in
- (Blake) Everyone did a good job helping me jump back into the work to make sure it got finished, communication was good here

What was Bad?

- (James) For a long time I was the only one working on the project, NO ONE else was helping so I didn't get too much time to study for finals
- (Jacob) Didn't ask enough or the right questions in office hours, not in just this sprint alone, within the last couple weeks
- (Naeun) Wished I could've partitioned time better to begin helping with a majority of the tasks sooner
- (Isabel) Team lead, though I understood definitely put in a lot of his own time/work, became very passive aggressive and mean and was not an effective team lead
  - [Conflict Resolved]
- (Blake) That we saved a bunch of work for the last couple days. For the scale of the project we should have been working on these parts weeks before

What needs to Change?

- Avoiding One Person Putting in WAY More Hours/Work Time
  - James, even though he had higher availability than most team members, went way above and beyond work hours to pick up the slack of the rest of the team to help make sure things were getting done and that we met specifications to turn in on time

- Ex. To avoid this in the future it is essential that team members comply with the availability they put for themselves for that week UNLESS an emergency comes up. And that the availability is per day, So we break down hours each day that sprint week that members can work on the project.
- Ex. Based on the above implementation, if two people have same available hours that day that they jump in on a call together so that they can work together/ask each other questions
